Women in Indian society has traditionally been confined to household chores looking after kids, cattle and kitchen while the men would venture out to earn money for the family. But with the changing times women have now started to share the responsibility of earning with men, an extra income not only gives self-confidence to a woman but also assists in her liberation in true sense. Although in big towns and cities it is quite common to see women working along with men but in rural areas its still tough to find women working at par with men. The rural women has started to organise themselves into small groups called Self Help Groups (SHG's) to pool in their money and utilize their spare time to engage in some kind of economic activity like making pickles, handbags, soft toys, squashes and various handicrafts. SHG's has been providing new avenues to the women to generate some extra income in their spare time but the women have been finding it difficult to market their products. With a view to provide a platform to such SHG's Centre for Sustainable Development organised an exhibition-cum-sale of products made by these SHG's during the Devta and Nalwar Mela held at Sundernagar from 20-28 March. During this exhibition women from different SHG's displayed their products for sale. [caption id="attachment_346" align="aligncenter" width="300" caption="Various Products on Display"]
